By Judicial Decree By Commander James Bondage

Imagine a world where debt could mean permanent servitude, where a debtor or anyone associated with him could receive a life sentence for no crime other than being connected with someone who owed money he or she would never be able to pay. And it was not just servitude. Those who were made to serve had no rights whatsoever. They could be used or punished in any way the owner desired, and no one would care. There were no laws to protect them. As the auctioneer announced, they were “legal for all purposes”. Elenora was beautiful, with an air of innocence about her. Olivia was a leading socialite, wife of an apparently successful businessman, and determined to be at the very top of County society. Instead, both young women are arrested and are to be sold at the local auction. Elenora will undoubtedly fetch a very high price, but Olivia’s attitude makes it clear that she is going to be difficult and will not adapt to her new role easily. Quentin Scales, the best buying agent in the County, is certain that his employer will want both of them, even if he has to pay the highest price ever seen at auction in order to acquire Elenora.

Editorial Review

About the Author

Commander James Bondage is a retired attorney, with a Master's Degree in European History. His courtroom experiences account for the setting of the "By Judicial Decree" books, and his background in military history helped with the details of the "Cadet" series of books. He is also an avid chess-player, golfer and life-long science fiction addict. He has worked in movies and television as a background actor, but perhaps he is the kiss of death for television shows: he has been in three of them, all of which have been cancelled before completing the first season (including the now infamous "Do No Harm", which only aired twice before getting the axe).
