Editorial Review

From the Inside Flap

Anji gathered her bag, and by the time she walked to the coat pegs by the door, Thomas was holding her coat for her. He rested his hands on her shoulders for a fraction of a second, but still, the heat of his hands warmed her shoulders. Being treated with such care was easy to get used to. Those little gallantries were some of the many things she'd been missing since Ivar died.

"Thank you," she said over her shoulder with a smile. Looking up into his twinkling blue eyes made her catch her breath. Stop this, she ordered herself as they made their way to the front door. Thomas Devlin is a friend, a delightful friend, but that is all. Besides, you know he's unavailable. Since when had her mind gone veering off in a romantic direction?

It had not been two years yet since Ivar had died. So technically she was still in mourning, even though she had put off her widow's weeds before she arrived back in North Dakota. Had she remained in Norway, that would not have been permitted. The thought of Ivar drenched her eyes. Grief was strange, attacking at odd moments, then running off again as if gleeful at the misery left behind. She dabbed at her eyes as she stepped through the door.

"Are you all right?" Thomas asked, being too perceptive for her comfort.

After sniffing and forcing a nod, Anji paused on the south-facing steps and lifted her face to the sun.

Anji's Return to the Red River Valley Offers a Fresh Start--and a Surprising Second Chance at Love.

Anji Baard Moen, recently widowed in Norway, returns to North Dakota with her children. She quickly settles back into life in the familiar surroundings of Blessing, teaching in the high school and writing articles for the Blessing Gazette. In the midst of an unexpected crisis, Anji is thrust into a role she never imagined. And almost without her even being aware, an old friendship begins to show signs of developing into something more.

Meanwhile, Thomas Devlin, a minister without a post, has arrived in town. Devlin supports himself as a journeyman carpenter, and with the town growing rapidly, he has no shortage of opportunities. Establishing himself in a new community has its challenges, but as the newcomer gets to know the young widow whose house he's been working on, he thinks he may have found yet another reason to stay. . . .
